

Women as Deceivers in the Hebrew Bible

Lindy Gervin

Sacramento, California

ABSTRACT Using Eve, Rebekah, and Delilah as examples, the concept of women viewed as deceivers in the Hebrew Bible is examined.

Even a superficial reading of their stories substantiates that the focus of the Hebrew Bible, and most scholarly studies to date, are patriarchal in nature. These three women are significant figures who defied the patriarchy of their times. Although their actions are immediate, it is possible that their initial intention were to overturn men's suppression of women throughout the ages.

Jews altered the Old Testament for a millennium after the Crucifixion in order to dethrone Jesus Christ in their tampered Hebrew fraud. At the time of Jesus Christ's Incarnation, there was no complete Hebrew Bible. This text ultimately became the Hebrew Bible or Masoretic Text when it was codified by Aaron Ben Asher in the A.D. 10th century and was latter given the stamp of sacred authorization by none other than the anti-Catholic, Maimonides!" <https://callmejorgebergoglio.blogspot.com/2019/01/fresh-off-drukn-bible-of-friendship.html>.
